ANNUAL REPORT
2014-2015

UN Women is the UN organization dedicated to gender equality and the empowerment of women. A global champion for women and girls, UN Women was established to accelerate progress on meeting their needs worldwide.

UN Women supports UN Member States as they set global standards for achieving gender equality, and works with governments and civil society to design laws, policies, programmes and services needed to implement these standards. It stands behind women's equal participation in all aspects of life, focusing on five priority areas: increasing women's leadership and participation; ending violence against women; engaging women in all aspects of peace and security processes; enhancing women's economic empowerment; and making gender equality central to national development planning and budgeting. UN Women also coordinates and promotes the UN system's work in advancing gender equality.

Foreword by the Executive Director

Leveraging strategic partnerships for transformative action in gender equality

In 2015 we look to a new sustainable development agenda for 'people, planet and prosperity', with gender equality and women's empowerment at its heart. UN Women is rising to that challenge and building upon a history of achievement, including major results for women and girls in 2014.

In everything we do, we recognize that success is founded on partnership. We have taken every opportunity to encourage the world to live up to the commitments made 20 years ago in the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action. In 2014, in a review of unprecedented scale, 167 countries undertook national stock-taking of their implementation of those gender equality promises. The process, and the results, have supported an intense programme of mobilizing re-commitment to stepped-up, transformative action before 2020, culminating in a "Planet 50:50 by 2030".

A growing share of our strategic partnerships are now starting to take root in the corporate sector as we work together on fostering women's economic empowerment and calling on men to take responsibility and be accountable for change.

In September 2014 we launched the HeForShe campaign and generated millions of conversations both through social media and in person, as those who signed up also spread the word. The initiative "IMPACT 10x10x10", launched in January 2015 at the World Economic Forum, engaged champions within governments, corporations and universities as leaders of immediate change in each sector, using technology creatively to targeting influential issues like financial inclusion, quotas for political representation, wage parity and elimination of gender-based violence.

In our flagship report Progress of the World's Women, 2015-2016: Transforming Economies, Realizing Rights released in April 2015, we exposed the stark gender imbalances in the global economy, with new data, and recommended solutions for governments to implement. Work across the United Nations system with partners such as ITU and ILO is helping us to entrench domestic and international development policies that support women's access to decent work and equal pay and alleviate the crippling burden of unpaid care carried by women the world over.

Civil society, including trade unions and workers' movements, remains a bedrock partner for all our endeavours, both as the everyday voice of conscience and the invaluable "feet on the ground" in times of humanitarian crisis, such as during the Ebola Virus Disease outbreak, Tropical Cyclone Pam, and the growing number of complex, interconnected threats to international peace and security, in particular the emergence of a rising wave of violent extremist groups who are directly and explicitly targeting women's rights.

Ultimately, all our work is directed towards changing lives, and helping women and girls achieve their full potential. We are driving for better educational opportunities for girls and women, including through the increased use of technology, as well as measures to continue to increase and consolidate women's political leadership and ensure they are included in peacebuilding and recovery efforts during times of crisis. All of this requires increased and renewed investments, a strong commitment to improve data collection and analysis, accountability frameworks for leaders, and established responsibilities for all stakeholders, including the private sector.

This year's report provides examples that demonstrate UN Women's impact from the global to the individual level.

We are proud to have been part of the increase from less than 30 per cent to more than 50 per cent of women elected to the House of Representatives in Bolivia; the improved economic rights of 21,350 women home-based workers in Pakistan through increased access to registration services, food security and income-generating opportunities; the increase in Rwanda of capably-staffed one-stop crisis centres from 2 to 11 for women who have experienced violence; and the deployment of 23 experts in investigation and documentation of gender-based crimes to support international investigations or prosecutions in 12 different countries, leading directly to building cases against perpetrators of atrocities against women and girls. Across the world, UN Women is present, working with its partners, in its role as catalyst, supporter and leader for a gender-equal world.

The aspirations and actions set in motion this year will influence generations to come. We know this well and strive to achieve the maximum impact with the resources entrusted to us. We invest in evaluating our work so that we can continue to learn from what we do and to improve further. Independent evaluations by a number of key partners in 2014 confirmed our relevance and efficacy.

Gender equality remains underfunded on so many levels; yet a raised level of financing is essential to complete the ambitious agenda.

In this year's review process of the Financing for Development agenda UN Women is calling for transformative financing for gender equality. This requires unprecedented levels of funding—in scale, scope and quality. Prioritized, dedicated resource allocation and investment for gender equality are urgent imperatives. We will continue to work on aligning all sources of development funding and the institutions that manage them, whether public or private, domestic or international, with gender equality goals and we will promote multi-stakeholder partnerships as key to ensuring adequate and robust financing for gender equality and the empowerment of women.

As this report underscores, UN Women strongly commits to disrupting the status quo and collaboratively setting of new norms, delivering well-targeted programmes, and enlisting game-changing partners both within and outside the UN system to accelerate the pace of change.

Together we can usher in a new era that is more just, resilient, and inclusive of all.

Raising the bar with global standards

Celebrating a landmark

The 1995 Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action charged governments and people around the world with achieving gender equality and women's empowerment. It remains a landmark commitment, and UN Women seized its 20th anniversary to step up action to make all parts of its far-reaching vision real in women's lives.

Early in 2015, the UN Commission on the Status of Women met to assess the status of global implementation of the Beijing Platform for Action and to take stock of where women stand in the world today. An unprecedented 167 countries undertook national reviews, with findings summarized in an authoritative report issued by the UN Secretary-General. While governments set a high bar in Beijing, and there have been many advances, the report declared unequivocally that progress must accelerate.

Everywhere there were signs that more and more people recognize the gaps and are ready to speed up change. To mark Beijing+20 leading up to the Commission, UN Women ignited global public and political engagement with its campaign titled "Empowering Women, Empower Humanity—Picture It!" Through online and news media, it reached over 280 million people, inspiring an ever-growing circle of interest and action. A media compact with over 30 leading global outlets led to scaled-up, high-quality coverage of key gender equality concerns.

Forty events on the Beijing Platform for Action's 12 critical areas of concern, held around the world, convened leading experts, advocates and opinion-shapers to map future directions on issues from education to jobs to political participation or media. These included, for example, a partnership with the Geena Davis Institute that produced the first-ever global study on the often limited, discriminatory portrayal of women in films.

The Commission brought government representatives and a record 4,500 NGO participants together for a vibrant discussion and debate. Over 650 events covered topics from increased financing for gender equality to the roles of men and boys. Stock exchanges in New York, Cairo, Warsaw, Stockholm, Istanbul, Lagos and Bombay rang their bells for gender equality, and thousands of people marched in the streets of New York City with the call "Planet 50-50 by 2030: Step It Up for Gender Equality."

Setting global norms and standards is a critical step towards action to achieve gender equality and women's empowerment. Through annual meetings of key UN bodies as well as other intergovernmental negotiations, UN Women offers expertise and evidence, good practices and lessons learned, to help governments make commitments that are fully aligned with women's rights. We call for specific attention to be paid to gender equality, and for gender dimensions to be integrated across all issues fundamental to human progress.

business and activism insisted that gender inequality have a 2030 expiry date and urged concrete actions to “Step it Up.” Media coverage during the Commission, including on International Women's Day, totaled 5,000 news reports in 90 countries, while social media engagement reached nearly 1.2 billion unique users.

The Commission concluded with governments committing in a political declaration to six core strategies to accelerate progress towards gender equality. They agreed to significantly ramp up investment in empowering women and ending discrimination, and pledged to do more to implement laws, transform discriminatory stereotypes and enhance data to track progress. Starting in 2016, the Commission will devote a segment of its session to discussions among government ministers, a signal of strong political commitment.

Advancing regional commitments

Preparations for Beijing+20 included not only 167 in-depth national reports, but also progress reviews for all regions. In the Arab States region, for example, UN Women joined the League of Arab States and the UN Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia in 2015 to conduct the region's most comprehensive review of Beijing to date—21 out of 22 countries participated. It reaffirmed Member State commitment to all 12 areas of concern in the Beijing Platform for Action and explicitly committed to provide resources to implement it.

The regional review built on consultations, hosted a year prior by the League of Arab States and UN Women resulting in the Cairo Declaration, considered the most progressive political commitment to women in the region to date. In a transformative shift, it pushed forward agreement on upholding women's reproductive health and rights, long a contentious topic, and issued the first formal call for referring all cases of violence against women to formal judicial systems. The meeting marked the first time that the League of Arab States considered civil society perspectives in talks on gender equality and women's empowerment.

Putting gender equality at the centre of new and historic agendas

UN Women has been the major global advocate and maker of the substantive case for putting women and girls at the centre of the post-2015 sustainable development agenda, slated for completion at a Summit of Heads of State and Government in September 2015. Governments responded to our early call for a gender equality goal as well as the integration of gender equality considerations in targets under other goals of the agenda.

Intersecting with the post-2015 agenda are historic talks on financing for development and climate change. UN Women has led calls for dramatically scaling up investments in gender equality and the empowerment of women, including by ensuring that official development assistance helps advance the Beijing Platform for Action. We urged recognition of the gender dimensions of climate change as a general principle, and specifically with regard to adapting to climate shifts, building capacities to respond, technology transfer and financing. A new draft climate agreement to be considered at the end of 2015 now refers to all of these elements. For the 2015 Third World Conference on Disaster Risk Reduction, UN Women successfully called for governments to agree to include gender equality dimensions in all related policies and practices, such as early warning systems, and response and recovery efforts. At the 2014 UN Third International Conference on Small Island Developing States, UN Women had a major part in ensuring that the agreement, known as the SAMOA Pathway, recognizes the centrality of gender equality and women's empowerment to sustainable development, spells out commitments to women's special needs and roles in key areas such as water and sanitation, and vows to end violence against women.

UN Women's concerted advocacy on the 10th anniversary of the World Summit on the Information Society persuaded governments to call for closing the technology gender divide, including by using innovations to expand women's opportunities in employment and as entrepreneurs.

Leading the way to parity in politics

Parliaments

Turkey's June 2015 elections brought encouraging news as women took nearly 18 per cent of parliamentary seats, up from just over 14 per cent. While this remains far below parity or even the global average, it signals the stirrings of change beginning within the soaring white marble walls of the Grand National Assembly.

Even before the elections, drawing on UN Women assistance, in partnership with the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the Assembly had begun to systematically tackle some of the issues that have kept women mostly on the margins of political debate. The shift started with the Committee on Equal Opportunity for Women and Men conducting a gender self-assessment of the Assembly, only the fifth such exercise in the world.

Evidence of gender gaps led to new awareness and action. More women now serve on parliamentary bodies, including the powerful Committee on Planning and Budgeting. Greater gender responsiveness became a plank in the Assembly's institutional strategy. Turkey's first comprehensive gender review of fundamental legislation put proposals on the table to usher in changes in laws related to local administration, education and employment, among other areas.

For the legislative experts who support parliamentary committees, gender equality training now helps them look for gender dimensions in draft legislation, whether the subject is energy or industry, social services or the environment. A gender checklist makes this step a matter of routine.

"We see laws in an entirely new way," affirms one expert. "We know that all issues relate to gender equality, and that all laws can contribute in some way to advancing it. This knowledge will help us in everything we do."

Elections

Gender imbalances in political representation can sometimes be dramatically redressed during election processes. In Bolivia, engagement with the electoral tribunal and UN partners to advocate for political parties to comply with new regulations on gender parity led to spectacular results in the 2014 elections. Bolivia became the third country in the world to reach gender parity in its lower house, with women Parliamentarians at just under 51 per cent. Previously, women comprised less than 30 per cent.

Most decision-makers in governments, parliaments and local councils are still men. The disparity not only denies women the right to participate and lead, but also means lawmaking often overlooks their experiences and needs. To close the gap, UN Women backs legislative and constitutional reform, and helps women gain traction through electoral processes, among other measures. Empowering gender equality advocates equips them to unleash change.

Elections in Guinea Bissau in 2014 offered the chance to consolidate fragile stability in the wake of earlier political violence. UN Women helped ensure the process also boosted the number of women involved, coordinating closely with the Peace Building Fund, the UN Integrated Peacebuilding Office, UNDP and women's activists. For the first time in the country, several hundred women were trained as election monitors; over 4,000 benefited from civic education. Fifty women candidates honed their skills in running for office. When the poll was held, the percentage of women voting topped a record 80 per cent. This visibility combined with advocacy for gender equality among top political leaders led to the historic appointment of women to a third of posts in the new government, among the highest ratios in Africa.

The Pacific region is notable for having some of the world's lowest levels of women in parliament, but that is beginning to change, supported by UN Women's long-standing advocacy and training of women candidates. In the Solomon Islands, a record number of women ran for parliament in 2014, and while only one was elected, she became the second to ever win in a general election. Women candidates garnered double the number of votes they had received in the previous election. Fiji elected eight women to its 50-member Parliament, one of whom went on to become the first woman Speaker of the House in the Pacific region.

Leadership

In more than 60 countries in 2014, UN Women backed measures to promote women's leadership and participation in politics, including by strengthening a cadre of aspiring women leaders. Under our Beijing+20 campaign, we partnered with the Government of Chile to bring 300 women leaders to Santiago, including Heads of State, ministers, parliamentarians, senior UN officials, Nobel laureates, business representatives and activists, all drawn by their commitment to rapidly increase the number of women in decision-making positions. With political leadership key to propelling progress across the Beijing Platform of Action, they signed a Call to Action to rev up political actions behind full implementation by 2030, including by ending gaps in funding for gender equality.

Across East Africa, UN Women is helping women become more effective leaders in both public and private spheres. A partnership with Kenya's Kenyatta University led to the establishment of the African Centre for Transformative and Inclusive Leadership, which has a special focus on women and youth; by the end of 2014, over 300 people had attended courses. Several participants from Ethiopia returned home to set up a mentorship programme for women leaders in several ministries, while in Somalia 28 women parliamentarians acquired knowledge and skills that helped them establish a women's parliamentary caucus.

WOMEN OF ACHIEVEMENT:
VANDANA BAHARU MAIDA

A woman's place is on the village council

Few in her sleepy village would have once imagined that mother and homemaker Vandana Baharu Maida would be planning roads and building schools today. But in Khankhandvi, India, Maida bucked family opposition and cultural norms to win election as the first woman head of her village council.

India's quotas for local political offices have spurred one of the greatest successes globally for women's empowerment and grass-roots democracy. Just a decade ago, women comprised less than 5 per cent of leaders elected to village councils. Today, they make up over 40 per cent.

Articulate and determined, Vandana aims at nothing less than a better life for her community. Using vital leadership skills developed through training by UN Women, she has mobilized her council to build new sanitation systems, a village pond to counter chronic water shortages and the village's first primary school. But she considers her greatest achievement inspiring her neighbours to regularly participate in the council and demand that it respond to their concerns.

"Concentrate on your work and do it to the fullest," she advises. "Be confident. The patriarchal society will oppose every action. (But) once you achieve success, everyone will start appreciating your efforts."

Making economies work for women

Climate resilience

Married at age 14, Mahera used to depend on her husband to bring home an income from collecting fish, crabs and wood in the Sunderbans, the world's largest tidal mangrove forest, which is highly susceptible to climate change. He could never earn enough, so Mahera started coming along, leaving her baby son in the care of her mother. Wading through mud and roots slashed deep cuts in her legs, and provided only marginal additional income.

Poverty, gender discrimination and climate shocks intersect in stark ways. Poor women have the fewest resources and options to cope with climate-related disasters, even as many are on the frontlines of responding to them. Greater resilience, however, can do much to ease risks. UN Women has helped over 19,000 women, like Mahera, build better systems of support and preparation.

In the 10 poorest and most vulnerable districts of Bangladesh, they have formed disaster resilience groups to learn about climate impacts and how they can minimize threats. The poorest members receive training and inputs to start small businesses, such as rearing chickens and goats, and marketing handicrafts. Around 1,500 women have already generated enough income and profits to expand their businesses.

Mahera set up a small shop selling tea, biscuits and other sundries in a local market, doing so well that she recently moved to a larger location. Both her children are going to school, acquiring a new source of resilience that will last throughout their lives.

Skills training

Women grow much of the world's food, but receive little in the way of support, such as through agricultural extension services. UN Women addressed this issue in the poorest region of Albania by helping women organize cooperatives, and develop leadership and financial skills to manage them. They have learned to improve the quality of their products, such as through proper drying methods for herbs and fruits, and to market them with attractive labeling. Selling more of their crops means an earnings increase many never imagined possible.

Among the nearly 30 million migrants in Southeastern and Eastern Europe and Central Asia, the majority are women. But many women are also left behind, often in poor rural areas with few options to earn an income. In Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan, UN Women has helped nearly 6,000 women form self-help groups. They have acquired new skills and improved knowledge on how to access markets and start businesses. Tajikistan's programme now operates in 12 districts, guided by research pinpointing the most vulnerable households. National microcredit institutions have started piloting a special credit product tailored specifically to poor rural women.

Women play essential economic roles—more women in the labour market speeds growth. Yet many can find only poorly paid informal jobs, unprotected by labour laws and without social benefits. UN Women assisted 76 countries in 2014 in making economies work better for women, such as by connecting women to new skills and technology, and designing gender-responsive policies to level the playing field.

Social protection

Collaboration among UN Women, UNICEF and the World Bank has helped improve social protection services for women in three Caribbean countries. When focused research delivered compelling evidence of how these services were not reaching vulnerable groups such as woman-headed households, Grenada, St. Kitts and St. Lucia reworked and passed policies and laws to close disparities. They are now developing gender-responsive poverty targeting tools to better guide service delivery. Women in all three countries will enjoy greater access to job and skills training. Households headed by women are expected to benefit from expanded school feeding programmes and transportation allowances for children, while cash assistance initiatives will offer lifelines to the poorest of these families.

Technology

Technology is increasingly essential for education and work, yet women and girls do not enjoy equal access. In 2015, UN Women joined UNESCO in sponsoring Mobile Learning Week, where hundreds of educators and experts from around the world debated topics such as how to expand web skills among women and girls, and ease entry into tech careers. Collaboration with Technovation, a global technology entrepreneurship programme for girls, sponsors competitions in 25 countries that shine a spotlight on young women with strong promise as technology entrepreneurs.

WOMEN OF ACHIEVEMENT: CRISTINA BUARQUE

Teaching rights and skills, touching 100,000 lives

When Cristina Buarque joined the state government of Pernambuco, Brazil in 2007, she was one woman among 24 state secretaries. But that didn't stop her, as head of the Secretariat for Women's Policies, from launching a massive social inclusion programme that has since benefited over 100,000 poor women.

It provides professional training—often in better-paid trades commonly reserved for men. Women have become plumbers, electricians and masons. They also go through an intensive course, with feminist trainers, on issues such as human rights and women's struggle for justice.

"Women need to understand their rights," Buarque explains. Formerly an academic, she entered the political arena "to bring the work I was passionate about to a larger scale."

Buarque's achievement features in UN Women's 2015 flagship report Progress of the World's Women: Transforming Economies, Realizing Rights, which calls for making economies work for women's rights and equality. Many of the benefits, such as fairer societies and more dynamic economies, would accrue to all, women and men. Ten key actions include equal access to productive resources and an equal voice in economic decision-making.

Putting an end to violence against women and girls

Services

When Mary arrived at one of Rwanda's Isange One Stop Centres with a broken arm, she was too traumatized to speak. At 32 years old, with four children, she had just left her 17-year marriage to an emotionally and physically abusive husband.

Today, with the help of the centre's integrated medical, legal, psychosocial and protective services, she is slowly rebuilding her life. "The centre has provided me with hope – and a place to start recovering," Mary says. "Without it I would have nothing."

UN Women is part of a team of UN agencies that worked with Rwanda's National Police and several central ministries to introduce and expand the centres. Before they were established, women survivors of violence could only turn to hospitals, which treated their physical wounds, but were not equipped to provide other essential services. Today, there is at least one centre in each province, readily accessible to a large share of the population, and plans aim to ensure national coverage.

In Cameroon, UN Women helped establish the first call centre for survivors of gender-based violence, with a focus on those at risk of HIV. Callers receive counselling and immediate referrals to medical care. Media outlets have mobilized to spread information about the toll-free number, as well as messages to raise awareness of violence and HIV. Through a number of key government offices, a joint effort is underway to push for expanding judicial recourse and legal assistance for survivors.

Globally, UN Women and UNFPA lead a UN joint programme to boost the quality of essential services for women and girls surviving violence. By the end of 2014, it had developed standards for health care, police and judicial responses, and social services, to be complemented by a fourth area, the coordination and oversight of services. Ten countries will be chosen to test the standards.

Laws

Recent studies have shown horrific levels of violence against women in several Pacific countries. But in 2014, Kiribati, Solomon Islands, Tuvalu and

At least one in three women has been a victim of physical and/or sexual intimate partner violence at some point in her life. UN Women works to eliminate all forms of violence against women and girls. We help strengthen efforts to prevent and respond to it, including by supporting the development of laws and improving the availability and quality of services. In 2014, we supported 80 countries to end violence against women.

one State in the Federated States of Micronesia took a huge leap forward by adopting new laws to stop it. The sea change is the culmination of several years of concerted advocacy, as UN Women helped mobilize supportive international partners and national women's groups, sponsored public consultations, provided data mapping the scope of the problem, assisted with legal drafting and drew on political commitments made at the 57th Commission on the Status of Women.

UN Women helped Georgia align its legislation with the Council of Europe's Istanbul Convention, such as by criminalizing forced marriage and expanding the authority of police to remove perpetrators in domestic violence cases. When Brazil passed its first law criminalizing femicide, it became the first country in Latin America to begin integrating the Latin American Model Protocol for the Investigation of Gender-related Violent Deaths in national legislation. The protocol was developed through a process of consultation with 200 experts in 18 countries coordinated by UN Women and the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights.

Education and awareness

In 2014, global rollout began of a unique curriculum designed by UN Women and the World Association of Girl Guides and Girl Scouts. "Voices against Violence" teaches young people how to prevent violence. By 2016, it is expected to reach 800,000 children and youth aged 5 to 25 in 12 countries. The first regional trainings took place for Asia, Europe and Africa, with workshops for the Americas and French-speaking African countries to follow. They equip national trainers and youth leaders to deliver the curriculum to girl guides and scouts. Participants will learn about root causes, prevention and ways to access support, earning a "Voices against Violence" badge.

In Kigali, Rwanda, UN Women's Safe City Programme and Kigali Municipality supports a city-wide campaign to prevent sexual harassment on public transport by reaching out to thousands of passengers on buses and 'taxi-motos'. On a major commercial bus line, for instance, screens alert riders that sexual harassment is prohibited. They are urged to report problems to trained drivers and conductors or call a special hotline.

WOMEN OF ACHIEVEMENT:

Wafa Khaleel Ayyad Muammar

Pioneering a high-ranking role for women police

Despite strife and societal pressure, Wafa Khaleel Ayyad Muammar joined the Palestinian Civil Police, among the first women to do so, and became its highest-ranking female officer. As head of the Family and Juvenile Protection Unit, she proves what women can achieve.

When Lieutenant Colonel Muammar began her career, during the turmoil of the Second Intifada, determination was her only weapon. She earned her Master's degree, while pregnant, walking through dangerous terrain to go to school until one week before the birth of her second child. Always knowing she wanted to be a police officer, she began her training right after.

Foremost among her goals has been to keep women and children safe from domestic violence—the mission of her job today. UN Women partners with the police and a new pool of specialized prosecutors in helping to bring justice to women survivors.

"Women in the police are now more accepted and even celebrated as leaders," Muammar says. "I am proud to be one who led the way."

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

In 1993, the UN General Assembly Declaration on the Elimination of Violence against Women provided a framework for action on the pandemic.

But more than 20 years later, 1 in 3 women still experience physical or sexual violence, mostly by an intimate partner.

Including women, building lasting peace

Peace processes

For decades, sexual and gender-based violence went unchallenged in Colombia's internal conflict. Different armed groups used it to terrorize communities and destroy the social fabric. They targeted LGBTI civilians. In some armed groups, women combatants were raped and forced to have abortions. Few survivors spoke out, because even if they did, no one heard.

Despite their prevalence, sexual and gender-based crimes have rarely been prosecuted in Colombia. As it moves to end hostilities, however, understanding has grown among judicial officials that for peace to take root, the time for impunity is over. UN Women has helped advance investigations and prosecution by connecting the Attorney General's Office with top international experts, such as Daniela Kravetz, who spent a decade prosecuting similar violations at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

"I have worked a long time with victims," Kravetz says. "Justice is their right, and I will do whatever I can to bring that to them."

She now assists Colombian prosecutors with techniques to interview survivors, and in developing investigation plans and legal case theories. Following international courts, a new legal model is being instituted aimed at not just prosecuting individual cases, but connecting them so that leaders who orchestrated massive violations can be charged as well. The move comes not a moment too soon, given an enormous backlog of cases likely to emerge in the transition to peace—and the probability of a surge in new cases as combatants return to their communities.

As Colombia's broader peace process unfolds, UN Women has also backed women's unprecedented roles in the talks. Thorough training has honed skills of women negotiators so they can be the most effective gender advocates. Women participate on an equal footing in massive regional and national consultations linked to the process, and comprise a majority of delegations of victims presenting their concerns to the negotiations. A gender sub-committee provides ongoing inputs to keep gender equality high on the agenda.

Women lead peace movements and drive community recovery after conflict, but are still rare faces in forums to negotiate peace and settle security issues. Exclusion from post-conflict reconstruction constrains opportunities to recover, gain justice for abuses and shape reformed laws and public institutions. In 2014, UN Women helped women in 66 countries expand their roles in peace, security and humanitarian responses, and coordinated related global action by the UN system.

Transitional justice

In Uganda, until 2014, there was little formal recognition of the harm suffered by people in the northern part of the country at the hands of the Lord's Resistance Army. That changed when Parliament finally passed a resolution to assist conflict-affected groups. UN Women joined civil society groups and parliamentarians in backing the measure, which draws attention to sexual violence perpetrated against women and girls, and paves the way for transitional justice and reparations.

Legal recognition of women survivors of violence during the armed conflict in Kosovo<sup>1</sup> came to pass in 2014, following sustained advocacy by UN Women in partnership with civil society. The move was part of a new 1325 Action Plan, dedicated to fulfilling provisions of Security Council resolution 1325 (2000) on women, peace and security. A national council will extend services and reparations; UN Women has already begun trainings for judges, prosecutors and investigators on dealing with war crimes involving sexual violence.

El Salvador signed its peace accords 22 years ago, but the wounds of a vicious conflict remain, regularly reopened through widespread instability and impunity for violence. How the conflict specifically affected women had never been clearly understood, until UN Women embarked on comprehensive research on the issue.

This affirmed that most women survivors of violence had received no recognition or justice, and many who took on non-traditional roles during the conflict were forced back into traditional ones rooted in discriminatory norms. Strong evidence and compelling advocacy led to the creation of El Salvador's first National 1325 Committee to tackle these issues. It brings together the heads of major ministries, including foreign affairs, defense, labour, health and education, as well as parliamentarians and women's groups.

WOMEN OF ACHIEVEMENT: HOLO MAKWAIA

On a quest to end impunity for the world's worst crimes

For over 20 years, lawyer Holo Makwaia has been a leader in the quest to end impunity for crimes perpetrated in conflicts.

A native of Tanzania, she was among the first investigators cataloguing human rights violations after Rwanda's 1994 genocide. Later, as a senior trial attorney at the UN International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, she prosecuted some of its largest and most complex cases, securing the first conviction for war crimes. The life sentence of former minister Pauline Nyiramasuhuko, the only woman tried for rape and genocide, broke new ground in international jurisprudence.

"An end to impunity is possible," Makwaia reflects. "We must give survivors reassurance that justice will prevail. It is the only way forward."

Today, Makwaia is part of a unique roster of experts, sponsored by UN Women and Justice Rapid Response. They ensure justice upholds the rights of women caught in some of the world's most complex conflicts. Makwaia recently collected evidence in the Democratic Republic of Congo against former general Bosco Ntaganda, charged with war crimes. For the first time, the International Criminal Court agreed to hear all charges related to sexual and gender-based crimes.

Taking action to meet women's humanitarian needs

Responding to crisis

Women were on the front lines of West Africa's Ebola crisis. From the earliest days, in cramped medical wards and rudimentary rural dwellings, they cared for dying patients and family members, witnessing extreme suffering. They soothed traumatized children, even as they mourned their own losses, and organized the rites to bury the dead. A disproportionate number caught the deadly virus themselves.

As the humanitarian response geared up, UN Women successfully carried out its coordination role by making sure that everyone involved recognized women's central role in preventing and responding to the crisis. We provided guidance to national partners on integrating gender issues across response and recovery strategies.

In Sierra Leone, in partnership with Oxfam, we helped the government conduct a study assessing the gender dimensions of the virus. We assisted the National Ebola Response Centre in setting up a gender pillar, and brokered an agreement that UN organizations would make gender equality integral to emergency response programmes, including by filling gaps in sex-disaggregated data.

With UNICEF, UNFPA and WHO, we supported the training of 29,000 male and female volunteers who trekked through heavy rains and along treacherous roads to deliver prevention messages, literally door-to-door, to 1.5 million people. Training on infection prevention for health-care workers has accompanied a campaign to restore confidence in health facilities, and persuade pregnant women and new mothers to return to using them.

In Liberia, we partnered with the Ministry of Gender and Development to tap women's networks, including female traditional leaders and rural women's groups, as conduits to share information and assist in tracking transmission. This resulted in a drop in infection in rural areas. Radio shows that once focused mostly on gender-based violence sent out prevention messages and offered resources for psychosocial support.

Before the epidemic struck, UN Women had sponsored a long-running cross-border trade programme that had helped thousands of women

Eighty million people required humanitarian assistance in 2014; over 75 per cent were women and children. Yet humanitarian action does not always factor in women's specific needs and vulnerabilities—even as women frequently take the lead in responding to crises. In 2014, UN Women coordinated efforts to improve the gender-responsiveness of relief efforts. We deployed gender advisors to 10 countries, and helped 20 countries embed gender equality principles across humanitarian plans and policies.

establish prosperous businesses. As the epidemic crippled the economies of both countries, a new crisis has begun for many of them. UN Women stepped forward to ensure that hard-won gains in livelihoods would not be lost. Working with Liberia's Central Bank, we set up a pipeline of direct cash transfers. Easily sent by mobile phone, these provide a vital infusion so women can sustain their businesses until the worst of the crisis is past.

Assisting refugees

In northeastern Kenya, the sprawling Dadaab complex is the world's largest refugee camp. Set up in 1991 after the start of civil war in Somalia, it is still a destination for Somalis fleeing drought and military action against extremist groups; half are women.

UN Women, in partnership with the Kenya Red Cross Society, has helped instil a new sense of hope by providing 300 women with opportunities to earn an income and better protect themselves. They have learned business management, livelihood and agricultural skills. Greenhouses help nurture their crops in a harsh climate, while a nearby market provides a place to sell the produce that they do not use for their families. The project also provides counselling services to survivors of violence, with a sharp rise in cases reported. Family mediation has drawn both women and men determined to have peace at home, if not yet in the wider world.

Natural disasters

The Pacific is one of the most vulnerable regions in the world to disasters linked to climate change. In the aftermath, displacement, stress and inadequate shelter can contribute to increased rates of rape and domestic violence. UN Women has collaborated with the Fiji Red Cross Society to keep women safe from more than storms.

Several hundred Red Cross staff and volunteers, the first responders in emergency evacuation centres, have gone through training on gender responsiveness. They now offer "dignity kits" with specific items for women and girls, and have learned to recognize and respond to gender-based violence, including through referrals to psychosocial support and appropriate authorities.

In Vanuatu, a mere three weeks after Tropical Cyclone Pam wreaked havoc, UN Women helped women market vendors and a local government to reopen the first market for fresh produce, a step towards restoring livelihoods. Colourful mounds of fruits and vegetables signalled hope for a return to normalcy.

WOMEN OF ACHIEVEMENT:
PRAGITA TULADHAR AND
NIRJALA POKHREL

Despite losses, women activists lead relief efforts

Nepal's 2015 earthquake shattered buildings and lives. But it did not destroy the courage of women who have stepped forward to help.

"My home and farm are completely damaged," recounts Nirjala Pokhrel, a volunteer from Pourakhi, a women's group normally active on the rights of women migrants. "So many women are affected. As a woman survivor, I understand their needs."

"We are all suffering," adds Pragita Tuladhar (photo), a volunteer from a women workers' organization, SABAH. "But we are gathered here to help others."

Disasters take a heavy toll on women. They can be more vulnerable to sexual and gender-based violence. Social norms, lack of information and burdensome household chores can render them last in line for help they desperately need.

Backed by UN Women, women's groups in Nepal have mobilized to put women at the forefront of relief efforts. They have helped distribute dignity kits and extend trauma counselling and psychosocial support, and led a strong collective call, through a Common Charter of Demands, for all forms of humanitarian action to meet women's specific needs.

Accounting for women in national plans and budgets

Gender-responsive budgeting

Gender-responsive budgeting was not well known in Jordan, until the 2013 budget circular required all ministry plans and budgets to include a gender dimension—a move advocated by UN Women. The next step was implementation. Working closely with the National Women’s Commission and the General Budget Department, we helped teach staff in key ministries how to move forward.

The training opened their eyes to various measures they could take to look at how well—or not—plans and budgets were taking Jordan closer to gender equality, and what could be done to redress gaps. It also opened ministry coffers. Budget allocations for gender equality increased from USD 1.9 billion in 2013 to USD 2.15 billion in 2014.

In the area of health care, for example, this has meant that more women are covered by health insurance, and have access to expanded reproductive health and family planning services. Funds for vaccines and medicines specifically for women have more than doubled. For the first time, a citizen’s budget brochure has been issued, showing people at large the breakdown of funds for gender equality.

Countries across Europe are increasingly tapping UN Women’s widely recognized and unique expertise in gender-responsive budgeting. In the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, the Government in 2014 adopted a method to integrate gender across selected programme budgets of all central institutions within five years. Moldova took steps to extend gender-responsive budgeting to the local level, as part of decentralizing government functions. Ukraine introduced local gender-responsive budgeting several years back, resulting in an increase in services for women and youth, and has now moved to apply the practice at regional and national levels. Serbia has expanded the use of gender-sensitive indicators at the provincial level that provide a precise picture of how well budgets support the achievement of gender equality goals.

National planning

Integrating gender equality considerations across all national plans and Commitments to gender equality and women’s empowerment mean little without adequate planning and investment to turn promises into action. Deficits in funding are typically wide, however, while national plans overlook opportunities for advancement. UN Women provides knowledge and tools, and fosters national dialogues to make plans and budgets do more for women. In 2014, we engaged with 73 countries, strengthening gender equality priorities at the national and local levels.

programmes means that services will reach women and respond to their specific needs. In India, UN Women helped the Ministry of Rural Development to insert comprehensive provisions in five flagship national economic empowerment programmes, covering core issues such as rural livelihoods, employment, social protection and housing. The schemes cover 35 states and union territories, and in 2014-2015 generated nearly 1 billion days of labour for rural women, and ensured that over a million homes were registered in women’s names.

UN Women’s sustained support has helped the Government of Timor-Leste build skills to integrate gender across national planning—28 of 41 State institutions included provisions to advance gender equality in their 2015 annual action plans. This means, for example, that the Ministry of Justice now trains staff on legal drafting that accounts for women’s human rights. Expertise provided to the Ministry of Finance resulted in a requirement, embedded in a state budget circular, that all ministries include gender equality in annual planning and budgeting in 2015.

In China, UN Women worked with groups of women living with HIV to pinpoint stigma and gaps in services, and highlight these issues in reports to the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women. The Committee’s comments led to a national commitment for the new National Plan on HIV to take measures to eliminate discrimination against women living with HIV and support community women’s organizations that assist them.

For the first time, supported by UN Women, groups of women living with HIV took part in formulating Mozambique’s fourth national strategic plan on HIV/AIDS. Results of their advocacy included, for example, agreement to prioritize prevention programmes for adolescent girls, given a context where initiation rites and early marriages pose significant risks.

WOMEN OF ACHIEVEMENT:
LEONOR BRIONES

A passionate advocate for public funds for social goods

Leonor Magtolis Briones has spent her life making sure that public funds produce public benefits. A former National Treasurer of the Philippines, she is today a distinguished professor and head convener of Social Watch Philippines.

Under her leadership, the group has mobilized in the streets, lobbied parliamentarians and used access to information laws to uncover hundreds of millions of dollars in pork barrel funds. Proper oversight means steering these to programmes that serve the greater good, such as by providing better health care and education.

“It takes the combined outrage of media, civil society, the various religious faiths, educational institutions, and ordinary citizens to push government to do the right thing,” says Briones—well-known for her comprehensive insights into public finance and passionate commitment to good governance.

Briones believes the budget is the Philippines’ most powerful tool in the face of many challenges. UN Women concurs, having supporting a gender-budget exercise that helped more than double funds for gender and development programmes, from USD 1.3 billion in 2013 to USD 3.3 billion in 2014.

Mobilizing partnerships to accelerate progress...

UN coordination

At a police station in Kazakhstan, a report of domestic violence comes in, and a police officer is immediately dispatched. In earlier days, the response might have been to simply calm the situation or even ignore it all together. But now, the officer will take along tough new legal tools to protect survivors, including provisions to remove perpetrators from the scene, and link survivors to legal and other help they need.

The changes result directly from UN Women's mandate and ability to forge high-impact partnerships across the United Nations and beyond. Recent collaboration between UN Women and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe helped bring together national authorities, civil society groups, women's advocates and other UN entities such as UNFPA and UNICEF to strengthen laws against domestic violence. Changes expanded the definition of domestic relationships, increased the duration of protective orders and enlarged the role of local governments in beefing up public services.

UN Women and UNFPA are working to implement the new provisions. Training for police and judicial officials supported by UN Women has already encouraged a substantial jump in the number of protective orders. UNFPA is assisting with improved health services and campaigning against harmful practices such as early marriages. Both organizations are engaged in helping the national statistical agency conduct a national survey—the first in Central Asia—on the prevalence of various forms of gender-based violence. Initiated by the Government, it will provide the most accurate picture to date of the scope of the problem, information vital to choosing the most effective prevention and protection strategies.

To be a girl in Malawi is to face the very high probability of being married before age 18. This typically ends schooling and produces high-risk pregnancies—consequences that echo through a lifetime. To help uproot this harmful practice, UN Women has drawn the UN country team together for joint advocacy that contributed to passage of the Marriage, Divorce and Family Relations Bill in 2015—it stipulates 18 as the minimum marriageable age. A second new law, supported by UN Women, combats trafficking in persons—previously, Malawi was the only country in southern Africa without legal punishments for this crime.

As part of global mobilizing around Beijing+20, UN Women encouraged other UN entities to join in a successful push for a joint commitment from leaders of all major UN development organizations to ramp up investment in gender equality, increase results and deepen accountability for progress. Over a dozen workshops helped UN organizations build capacities to improve gender mainstreaming. For the third year, 62 organizations have reported on the UN-SWAP, a UN system-wide monitoring tool measuring progress on gender equality. Progress has been demonstrated on 14 of the 15 UN-SWAP performance indicators. Significantly, almost 60 per cent of UN organizations now have gender policies, the first requirement of the UN-SWAP, up from 20 per cent—the 2012 baseline.

In 2015, dozens of countries will approve new UN development assistance frameworks, which guide all UN activities in a given nation. UN Women supported the establishment of a roster of over 30 experts, on-call to help integrate a full range of gender equality provisions. A gender scorecard in Cambodia proved to be a pivotal tool in shaping a UN plan with an unprecedented commitment to equality and empowerment.

National committees

UN Women's 15 national committees mobilize public support and resources for gender equality. Established in 2013, the French National Committee has rapidly developed an important network of civil society and private sector supporters, convening 80 major businesses to promote the Women's Empowerment Principles. A partnership with pop-singer Inna Modja sparked broad media visibility through a video clip appealing to youth to help end violence against women.

The Finnish National Committee has enlisted an array of top Finnish artists and comedians to perform in sold-out shows that benefit UN Women programmes. The launch of the global HeForShe campaign brought on board an extraordinary number of male leaders in Finland, including the President, Sauli Niinistö, and a number of political party leaders. Artists, musicians and celebrities contributed pro bono video statements encouraging men and boys at large to sign up.

Civil society

Civil society voices resonated throughout Beijing+20, with UN Women providing vital support to their participation. We backed civil society research that highlighted women's current realities and shaped regional reviews and intergovernmental deliberations at the Commission on the Status of Women. As part of our universal mandate, we expanded partnerships with civil society in the United States and the Nordic countries.

To bring men into a process of probing male power and privilege and exploring what it takes to transform gender relations, UN Women partnered with the MenEngage Alliance on a global symposium in India. On an ongoing basis, UN Women's Civil Society Advisory Groups (CSAGs) at global, regional and country levels across 40 countries offer important guidance. In 2014, the Global CSAG was expanded to include youth representatives.

...and championing the call for change

Campaigns

It was a day when people in 70 countries across the world took a common but unusual step: they ‘oranged’ their neighbourhoods to call for an end to violence against women. Iconic landmarks such as the Empire State Building, the UN Secretariat Building in New York as well as the Sphinx and Pyramids of Egypt in Giza lit up with an orange glow —public pronouncements that no one who walked by could ignore.

Posters, painted walls and orange clothing signaled the hope for a brighter future without violence and a gesture of solidarity in response to a call by the United Nations Secretary-General’s UNiTE to End Violence against Women campaign, managed by UN Women.

Earlier in 2014, UNiTE took another opportunity to appeal to mass audiences. With the eyes of the world on the FIFA World Cup in Brazil, the campaign distributed a million stickers proclaiming O valente não é violento (“The brave are not violent”).

Newly appointed UN Women Goodwill Ambassador Emma Watson galvanized global attention when she launched UN Women’s HeForShe campaign to engage men and boys in advancing gender equality. She rallied her immense global fan base to engage in a conversation that has reached 1.2 billion people through social media. More than 300,000 have registered their support for ending discrimination against women through an app.

At the World Economic Forum in early 2015, with an audience of Prime Ministers and CEOs, UN Women unveiled HeForShe

Impact 10x10x10. It engages governments, corporations and universities as champions of gender equality, calling on leaders within these arenas to use their power and influence for change. Turkey’s top industrial conglomerate, Koç Holding, took quick action with a commitment to provide gender sensitization training for 100,000 people across the country by 2020, reaching out to communities through its extensive network of suppliers and dealers. It has sponsored a national HeForShe campaign with a blizzard of prominent advertisements and continuous social media messaging.

HeForShe activism across Africa includes endorsement by the Presidents of Kenya, Rwanda, Senegal and Sierra Leone. Malawi’s President also signed on, as did all members of the Cabinet and Parliament, while Paramount Chief Kyungu agreed to use his significant culture clout in advocating against harmful traditional practices. Gilberto Macuacua, a well-known media personality in Mozambique, is using his television programme and blog to get people talking about fighting violence against women.

In the Arab States, an unprecedented campaign kicked off in 2015 in partnership with advertising agency Impact BBDO Dubai. It cleverly overturned a long-standing social prohibition against publicly pronouncing “Your Mother’s Name.” A campaign video with clips of men on the street in Egypt abashedly explaining why they cannot say it sparked debate across the region; some social media users took to the web to proudly share their mother’s names. The video has received almost 5 million views across different online channels.

Private sector

Partnerships with businesses throughout the year unleashed the mass reach of advertising. Videos highlighting women's achievements and calling for gender equality were displayed pro bono across huge screens overlooking the top three NASCAR races, and similarly at eight National Football League games. Canvassers circulated in the audience to reinforce the messages by asking sports fans what they had learned.

On International Women's Day, NASDAQ and Reuters Screens in Times Square in New York, one of the busiest public spaces in the world, called on passersby to picture a world where men and women are equal, and then step up efforts to achieve it. UNHATE, the Benetton Foundation, for the second year championed UN Women's role on the International Day to End Violence against Women, with an advertising campaign and video in leading international outlets like The New York Times, and online.

A new Private Sector Leaders Advisory Council supports UN Women in accelerating economic and social progress for women and girls by contributing expertise, reach and resources. In 2014, an additional 155 companies signed the UN Women/UN Global Compact Women's Empowerment Principles (WEPs); 845 companies in total have made this commitment to business practices aligned with reaching gender equality.

UN Women's Fund for Gender Equality

In 2014, the Fund disbursed USD 7.4 million to 67 active programmes. These involved 79 civil society organizations, and directly impacted the lives of more than 210,000 women. In total, since its 2009 launch, the Fund has awarded USD 56.4 million to 96 programmes in 72 countries, reaching over 9.7 million direct beneficiaries.

The 2014 programmes helped 10,400 women access new sources of income and greater control over productive resources. Over 3,150 women became landowners, 6,200 accessed credit or loans, and 10,500 benefited from social protection measures and services. Training, campaigns and advocacy actions spurred the adoption of 550 new constitutional provisions, laws and policies protecting women's political and economic rights, and 58,000 women have actively participated in forums to influence policies.

In southern India, three partner organizations—IT for Change, Kutch Mahila Vikas Sangathan and ANANDI—are connecting rural, socially excluded women to mobile technologies. The women use these to document gaps in public services and call for action from their local representatives. The programme has strengthened links between more than 800 elected women and their constituencies. This has led to the processing of 7,000 claims for public benefits, and the passage of over 100 local government resolutions offering women better access to land, health centres and sanitation facilities, among other services.

The grantee Cotidiano Mujer led a nationwide advocacy campaign in Uruguay around the 2014 elections and the application of a one-time quota calling for women to hold at least 30 per cent of parliamentary seats. The poll resulted in historic gains as the number of female Senators rose from two to nine of the total 30 seats. The national Cabinet now has the greatest-ever portion of female ministers—the share soared from 15 per cent to 40 per cent. UN Women Goodwill Ambassador Emma Watson's visit to the country propelled momentum by capturing the attention of political parties, the press and the general public.

The Society for Protection of Nature in Lebanon has used a grant to draw wide attention to the merits of hima, a 1,500-year-old community-based method to sustainably manage natural resources—women play a prominent role in it. Rural women producing traditional handicrafts based on hima now have the first dedicated souk for their products in Lebanon, while BirdLife France plans to feature their wares in its online magazine.

The Fund for Gender Equality is UN Women's leading global grant-making mechanism dedicated to women's political and economic empowerment. It provides financial and technical support to high-impact programmes led by civil society organizations committed to providing services and upholding the rights of women and girls around the world, especially those in the most excluded and marginalized communities.

UN Trust Fund to End Violence against Women

In Colombia, Chile and El Salvador, a UN Trust Fund grant helps Sur Corporación de Estudios Sociales y Educación, a civil society organization, in training police on enforcing laws and policies to stop violence against women and girls. Over 700 officers have attended a course grounded in the principles of women's right to live free from violence. It teaches participants about different manifestations of violence, how to improve responsiveness, and how to track and follow-up on cases. A country exchange programme shares promising practices and experiences.

Improved communication between the police and women's organizations in all three countries has fostered common understanding of the scope of violence against women and girls. After the training is complete, comprehensive follow-up workshops bring representatives from the police and women's organizations together to narrow in on the most critical procedures and protocols to prevent and respond to gender-based violence.

Gender-based violence in and around schools in Viet Nam is so prevalent it has become one of the main barriers to girls' empowerment and gender equality. Plan Vietnam, a children's development organization, is using a UN Trust Fund grant to promote a solution—the Gender-Responsive School Pilot Model. Now being implemented in 20 secondary schools across Hanoi, the model encourages schools to be safe, accountable and child-friendly.

By the end of 2014, teachers in all 20 schools were using comprehensive manuals to talk about school-related gender-based violence with over 16,000 adolescent girls and boys. Among other issues, students learn to recognize and challenge inequitable gender norms, and violence in their everyday lives. Hundreds of students have turned to new school counselling services for psychosocial support.

In the Arab States, the Jordanian Women's Union has joined the Egyptian Centre for Women's Assistance and the Union de l'Action Feminine in Morocco to mobilize regional action to prevent the trafficking of women. In Jordan, 35 organizations have improved services, including through referrals to psychosocial and legal support. Outreach in highly vulnerable rural and poor communities in Egypt and Morocco has raised awareness of risks and rights under the law. Stronger networking and coordination has begun to link efforts by civil society groups, government officials and legal authorities to detect and stop trafficking, and has contributed to progress in drafting anti-trafficking laws.

The United Nations Trust Fund to End Violence against Women (UN Trust Fund) supports innovative, promising approaches to prevent and respond to violence against women and girls. Created by the UN General Assembly in 1996, and managed by UN Women on behalf of the UN system, it currently supports 95 initiatives in 71 countries and territories with grants totalling USD 56.3 million.

UN Women is grateful for the commitment from its growing family of donors. 2014 saw the greatest contributions to date, amounting to USD 322.8 million, a 17.2 per cent increase over the USD 275.4 million received in 2013. Breaking the USD 300 million ceiling was an encouraging and inspiring corporate achievement.

Total voluntary contributions for 2014 comprised USD 163.7 million for regular resources (USD 156.9 million in 2013) and USD 159.2 million for other resources (USD 118.5 million in 2013). Having surpassed its core and non-core targets, UN Women is exerting all efforts to sustain this momentum in order to reach the target of USD 500 million set by the UN Secretary-General.

Key 2014 milestones included having 143 government core donors, the highest number ever. The total comprised over 90 per cent of countries from the Latin America and Caribbean, and Asia and Pacific regions.

A vote of confidence by our donors

A 2014 report on UN Women by the Multilateral Organisation Performance Assessment Network (MOPAN), a network of 19 donor countries, was highly positive. It recognized UN Women's success in establishing itself as a new organization and achieving development results, even with limited resources. The assessment affirmed the relevance of UN Women's mandate, and dubbed its performance 'strong' on a series of indicators of effectiveness and impact. Among the four UN entities reviewed by MOPAN in 2014, UN Women had the highest number of 'strong' indicators, despite being, by far, the youngest organization.
